

bureau

New club for London creatives launches on Greenwich Peninsula Bureau now open in Design District

This month, London's creative industries get a much-needed boost, as their new dedicated club and workspace officially opens its doors to members. Set on Greenwich Peninsula, moments from the Tube, Bureau is a key part of the new Design District, and set to be the beating heart of its creative ecosystem.

Designed to meet the needs of freelancers, independent creatives, start-ups and larger organisations looking for flexible workspace post-lockdown, Bureau provides a hybrid 'third space', combining the freedom and flexibility of home working, with the focused structure, support, and sociability provided by the office environment. As such, it's a compelling proposition in a time where the future of the workplace is under more intense discussion than ever before.

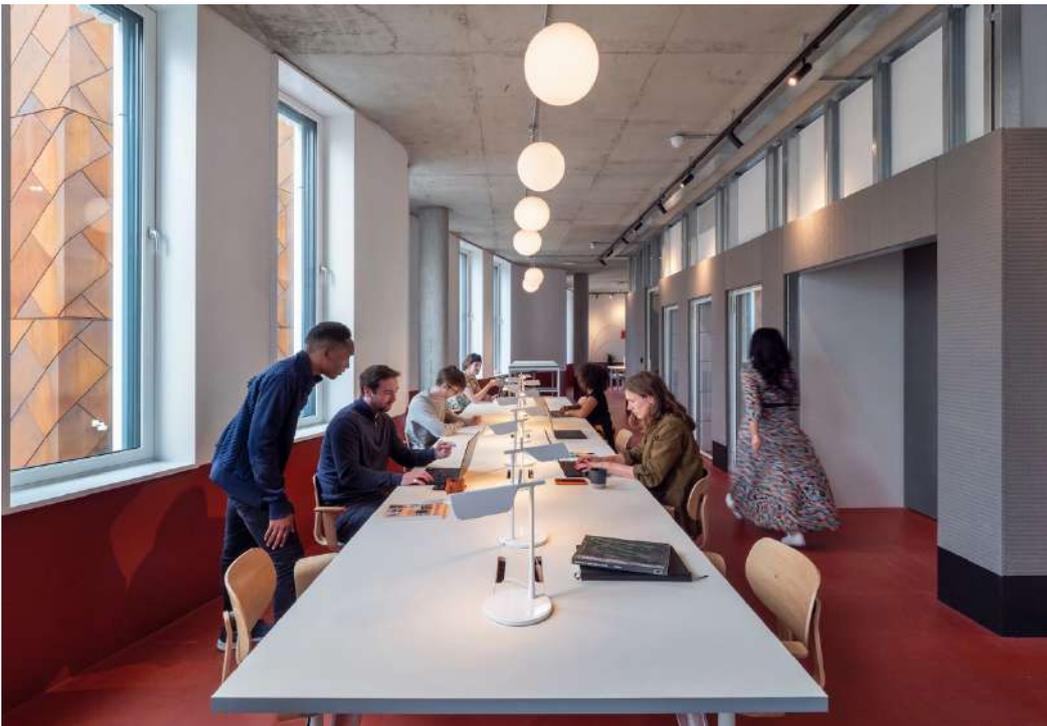

At the heart of Design District's dynamic creative community, Bureau offers flexible memberships with access to event and meeting spaces.

Bureau occupies two of the Design District's 16 cutting-edge buildings. One building is the vision of HNNA and houses a variety of working lounges and sociable

bureau

workspaces, plus the restaurant; the other, by Architecture 00, is ideal for members looking for more private and focused environments, and hosts Bureau's events. Roz Barr Architects is responsible for the elegantly utilitarian interiors, which have been designed to accommodate the new modes of work that have emerged through lockdown – such as daily Zoom meetings – and ensured there is a suitable space for every style of creative practice.

Bureau brings together talent from across the creative industries — everything from music to marketing, visual arts, gaming, fashion and UX design.

Membership starts at a highly competitive £80 a month. This gives access to workspace in one of the communal lounges, as well as Bureau's business-support services, calendar of creative events, and, of course, the wider community of creative students, professionals and businesses based in Design District. Hotdesking and fixed-desk memberships are available, as well as private studio space for teams of up to 10.

After 18 months of uncertainty and experimental working, the opening of Bureau offers freelancers and entrepreneurs from every creative discipline a place to work, exchange ideas and collaborate across disciplinary boundaries.

Bureau's members are already on site; the wider public will have to wait until Design District Creates – the new creativity festival kicking off on 15 September – to get a look inside.

bureau

A workspace fit for the future

Having developed the Bureau concept over the course of the pandemic, the Design District team have not only been able to ensure Covid-safety protocols and precautions will be in place from the beginning, they've also been able to address some of the issues that the rise of working from home made apparent.

Bureau brings creative people together. This is a new approach to workspace – prioritising not just room to think and do, but shared resources, strong networks and space to collaborate.

To ensure the site is never overcrowded, special operational software ensures a limit on the number of members permitted in Bureau each day, and which informs members of how busy the site is at any given time, so they can decide if and when to attend.

As well as plenty of space to work, members have access to everything they need to grow their businesses. The ample selection of meeting rooms includes acoustically adapted suites for video conferencing, accessed through a simple-to-use online booking system and at exclusive member rates. Breakout spaces include four distinctive lounge areas, as well as outdoor terraces and patios. The Salon can be transformed into a cinema for film screenings, and a dedicated event space is available for professional and social occasions at every scale.

bureau

Bureau members can choose a workspace that works for them, scaling up or down between lounge, hot desk, fixed desk or serviced studio.

Alongside state-of-the-art office facilities including 6th-generation WiFi and free printing, specialist professional facilities include photographic studios, post-production suites and a sound studio.

A dedicated programme for Bureau members offers both professional guidance and wellbeing support, while a wide-ranging calendar of events, talks and workshops curated by Bureau alongside industry leaders provides ongoing opportunities for professional development, networking, and creative stimulation. Helmed by a gifted and inventive chef, the Bureau restaurant is the social heart of the space, offering members a wide range of exceptional food and drink options, and is available to hire for special events.

Prioritising connection and creativity

After the end of lockdown, many in the creative sector are now exploring a return to some form of shared workplace. The limitations of working from home have become apparent to many people – especially those in the creative industries, for whom the opportunity to interact with others, throw ideas around and make unexpected connections is especially important.

bureau

Bureau is building a vibrant community of designers, makers, creators and free thinkers, each benefiting from strong networks and abundant opportunities for collaboration.

With the 9-to-5 office model seeming more and more out-of-date, but the isolation of permanent homeworking unappealing, Bureau offers the best of both worlds with minimal compromise.

The creative sector is a complex, multidisciplinary family of industries that deserves a dedicated space consciously tailored to its particular needs. Bureau provides it. Although the fact that the creative industries have been decimated by Covid, it is frequently and easily assumed that those in the creative sector are among the best positioned to work from home, so – despite the economic hit to the sector – creatives have been marginalised in discussions on the impact of lockdowns. However, the reality of creative work is that the ability to connect with others in a shared physical space – for ideas to collide and interpollinate – is critical to innovation.

Everything from the layout of the spaces and the events programme to the weekly communal no-tech lunches is geared to encourage members to make connections across disciplines, allowing for those inspiring moments of serendipity that can only occur in shared spaces – a key creative driver that is almost impossible to replicate when working from home.

bureau

Serviced studios are accessible seven days a week from £560. An ideal solution for teams that thrive on collaboration and the buzz of studio life. Fully serviced and available full or part time.

As part of Bureau, members are placed in the midst of a creative ecosystem: the wider Design District community. A one-of-a-kind crucible of ideas and innovation, the entire district has, like Bureau, been designed to nurture inter-disciplinary connection and collaboration, and members will be in the heart of a dynamic and inspiring environment.

“We want Bureau to be Design District in microcosm – somewhere that nurtures a diverse and dynamic creative community, giving freelancers a space to grow their businesses, connect across disciplines, build networks and advance their careers.”

– Helen Arvanitakis, director of Design District

Bureau is consciously structured to provide a pathway for professional growth: members can use Bureau to grow their practice, ascending membership tiers from hotdesk to serviced studio as they evolve, then move out to take tenancy of a Design District workspace when their business is fully fledged.

Bureau memberships can also serve larger international organisations that are exploring work-from-home alternatives for their teams, enabling staff to take advantage of a flexible, closer-to-home workspace, while requiring minimal company investment.

bureau

Designed by a world-leading architect team

Bureau spans two buildings: C3, designed by HNNA, has an undulating form with an irregular white exterior interspersed with large windows of different sizes and facing different directions. An inwardly falling roof on the top floor creates a pair of courtyards that serve as alfresco workspaces for members.

C3 houses the restaurant and main members' lounge and, thanks to its position at the entrance to the Design District, its reception serves as the front desk for the whole neighbourhood. Next door, D1 by Architecture 00 has floor-to-ceiling windows throughout and open-air terraces for circulation.

Both Bureau buildings include a variety of workspaces to accommodate all types and styles of creative work – from open, collaborative and energetic to quiet, calm and concentrated.

The interiors of both Bureau buildings are by Roz Barr Architects.

Interior architect Roz Barr has taken pains to ensure that each workspace is laid out and equipped to meet members' needs – intelligently designed with controllable task lighting, breakout areas for meetings, acoustically optimised Zoom meeting rooms, private spaces for phone calls, and informal spots to grab a coffee and catch-up with other members – a perk that those of us working from home have missed for much of the year.

bureau

“Our design for Bureau recognises the fact that the way we work and how we use office space is changing. It’s not about rows of booths and cubicles any more – we need places where we can connect with each other, build ideas together, and enjoy the magic of chance and happenstance. Above all else, Bureau is somewhere people can meet, work, converse and engage, and every aspect of its design encourages these things to happen.”

– Roz Barr, founder, Roz Barr Architects

The honest and utilitarian but sophisticated aesthetic of the Bureau is set by Roz Barr’s approach to materials – many of which are unexpected in an interior setting. Exposed galvanised stud walls and fibrous cement board are juxtaposed with Marmoleum on the floors and walls, and digitally printed carpets and rugs.

A fixed desk space that’s all yours – in Roz Barr’s spectacular interior space – is available for just £230 per month.

Sustainability has steered the material selection. The Marmoleum by flooring specialist Forbo is made from 97% recycled materials and is carbon-neutral. Natural fabrics have been used throughout. Sheet materials from small Welsh business

bureau

Smile Plastics have been used for the work surfaces, and recycled plastics also feature in the joinery.

Bureau's innovative furniture selection features pieces by some of the most respected designers in Britain and beyond, including work by the likes of Hay, Stuttgart-based Richard Lampert and British-Canadian Philippe Malouin. Desks are fitted with diecast aluminium legs from London manufacturer Very Good and Proper.

Naturally, consideration of Covid-19 has been factored into the design, and Roz Barr Architects have ensured that the internal spaces are adaptable, as well as paying attention to cross-ventilation throughout the spaces – effectively, everything is recycled but the air.

A unique offering: well located, accessibly priced

Set a few seconds' stroll from North Greenwich Tube station, Bureau is the only creative-workspace membership of its kind in South East London – and one of the most financially accessible in the city. Whereas some clubs can typically charge their members £200 a month or more, Bureau delivers a comparable service for as little as £80 a month +VAT , including service charge.

Membership is available now – sign up at bureau.club

bureau

Notes to editors

For more information about the Bureau and Design District, contact Rupert Evans-Harding via rupert@zetteler.co.uk

Bureau

Occupying two purpose-design buildings on Greenwich Peninsula, Bureau is a members' club and productive workspace for creatives, an affordable and dynamic space to collaborate, exchange ideas, socialise, and engage with the surrounding creative ecosystem of Design District. Bureau's innovative and versatile model of membership is designed to nurture and connect the community, leading to a stronger future for creativity in London and the UK.

bureau.club

Covid-safety software

The Bureau team have developed and designed the space to ensure the highest possible level of Covid-safety compliance, not only in terms of versatile workspace layouts that can easily accommodate social-distancing measures, but also in Bureau's operational technology. New membership software ensures that limits on the number of people inside Bureau buildings at any one time can be easily enforced, and individual members are automatically kept informed of how busy the site is, so they can make informed decisions about whether and when to use the space.

Design District

At the heart of Greenwich Peninsula, Design District is London's first permanent, purpose-built hub for the creative industries.

Conceived and developed by Knight Dragon, and designed by eight leading architects, the Design District's collection of 16 unique buildings supports an ecosystem of 1,800 creatives, encompassing individual makers, ambitious start-ups, ground-breaking enterprises and industry leaders.

The closest Tube station is North Greenwich (30 metres). The Jubilee line (24-hour on Friday and Saturday), gets you to London Bridge in eight minutes and Waterloo in 11.

designdistrict.co.uk